25. Vocational/Prevocational Services

The services listed in this chapter can assist the person with TBI to either: learn some skills for a career, help with the job seeking process, and/or get placed in a position (vocational); or learn or relearn about work attitudes, habits, and the social skills necessary for work success (prevocational).

People with TBI often believe that going back to work is 'the marker' of their recovery and the sooner they can get back to work, the sooner they can 'prove' to themselves as well as to others that they are 'completely recovered'. They may be unwilling to try a new experience (for example, prevocational or avocational program or new career emphasis) that you or the professional feel might be best. One strategy that can be helpful is to speak of it as a 'trial' experience: that "when you prove that you can do this, then we can look into jobs that are more to your liking." This statement is true because as the client's attention, memory, and ability to concentrate improve, s/he will be ready for more challenging work. Of course, even the best placement can go wrong, and if the job/training doesn't work out, please remember that this can be quite a blow to one's self-image; perhaps counseling or at least venting in a support group will help.

Since most persons with TBI are injured at a young age, before they have a career path established, there is bound to be some uncertainty of vocational direction. TBI can complicate the situation, as most persons with TBI are young and still exploring new options; 'having the rug pulled out' from under you with a TBI and then being pulled backwards into some 'prevocational' activity naturally has repercussions. Again, counseling often helps.

It is important in this process to have some accurate and comprehensive knowledge of where the client is in his/her physical, psychological, and emotional readiness for work. Some persons with TBI are socially adept enough so that they are able to convince you or the vocational counselor that they are ready for more than they can handle. Placement in a program or at a job before one is ready for it can and often leads to failure (poor performance in the program or termination from the job). This should be avoided because of the damage it does to the person's feelings of self-worth and dignity.

For those people who are not yet ready for paid work, volunteer work is an excellent avenue to explore. The Volunteer Exchange can match the volunteer's needs (type of work, location, hours) with their database of organizations seeking people.

A major resource for those with TBI is the Department of Rehabilitation (DR). They supply diagnostic evaluations, counseling, and case management, and they will fund any reasonable services for return to work, including training, testing, job referrals, job coaching and follow-along, and whatever else the client and counselor agree on. They also pay for supplies, transportation to training, tools needed for the job, and license or union fees. To be eligible for DR services, one must have a vocational objective, a medically diagnosed disability which prevents entering or return to employment, and some reasonable expectation that the services DR provides will enable the person to go to work.

A few years ago, DR started undergoing some profound changes in their selection process and in the way they work with their clients. The first change was that people with disabilities are all presumed to be able to benefit from DR's services and will not automatically be turned away because they are 'too disabled'. They will only be denied services after it is proven that the person cannot work even with all services provided. The second change is that DR may, if it is determined that there won't be enough money to pay for services for all clients, go into an 'Order of Selection' so that DR clients with the most serious disabilities will be served first. This is very good for those persons with TBI who have significant deficits in many areas, as they will be served first. The down side is that those with milder brain injury will be put on a list to wait for more money to become available.

Below are the local programs that work with vocational services, as well as a listing of the individual DR offices in the San Jose District and the locations and phone numbers of the other districts in Northern California. The Department of Rehabilitation has a very good record for placing people with disabilities. In the past, they had difficulty with cognitive disabilities, in part because of the newness of the disability and the lack of knowledge about the readiness of people with TBI to go back to work. This is changing!

SAN JOSE DISTRICT DEPARTMENT OF REHABILITATION COUNSELOR DIRECTORY

Below you will find a list of the local DR offices, the supervisors and counselors for each office, and the ZIP codes they serve. Case assignment is usually based upon each client's residence location (determined by zip code, but each client has the right to pick his/her office) and counselor specialty area. To facilitate the referral process, identify the appropriate DR office from the ZIP code list below, then initiate contact with that office and be certain to inform the Intake Counselor that your family member/client has a TBI, so that s/he is referred to an appropriate counselor.
